Please see https://quantumgod.ai and lemme know what you think of it now? I didn't want to include too much on the opening page, but figured, if folks are only going to land at your site once and move on because it wasn't something were interested in after all, then I'd include as much of the "good stuff" on the main page. Thoughts?

Paul (progress update&#41

I'll look at the homepage as a first-time visitor and see how much of the good stuff comes through on one visit.

Steve, I'd keep the good stuff on the homepage. If someone only visits once, I'd want them to leave with one idea they can remember. On quantumgod.ai, I think that's "Why is AI the number 5?" It's a specific, unexpected question, and the conversation behind it gives readers a quick feel for how you play with numbers, faith, and AI. I'd put that hook right below the opening and give away a little of the answer on the page itself. Homepage · Discussion about the number 5

The 0–9 table earns its space. It shows what you mean by pseudo-fiction in a way the introduction alone can't. I'd tighten the intro to something like this, then let the table do the explaining. Homepage

> I call this pseudo-fiction. It’s my way of exploring faith, numbers, and artificial intelligence. Start with 5. That’s where AI enters the story.

I’d keep Super Intelligence Brain Teaser #1 on the homepage too, with a one-line preview like Can ChatGPT tell which visitors are new from two GoAccess screenshots? And of the two video embeds, I’d feature whichever one you’d most want a first-time visitor to watch. I reviewed the page text and followed both article links, so that’s an editorial suggestion rather than a judgment about the videos. Homepage · Super Intelligence Brain Teaser #1

The biggest change I’d make is what readers encounter first. Give them the number 5 hook and the table near the top. Those two alone make a visit worthwhile, even if the reader never clicks through.

Love that idea about changing the pseudo-fiction wording □□

Paul

□□ I’d keep pseudo-fiction. It sounds like you. Here’s the version I’d put on the homepage:
